among the small commercial fishermen none at present is using powered [illegible] Chilwa although this will be the next step for some. It is obvious that [illegible] backs of this classification, like any other, is that the clear distinc[illegible] spurious. Thus, for example, even the small-scale fishermen are [illegible] sense that they sell part of their catch if they are able. And similarly [illegible] proportion of the catch of the large-scale fishermen is used for subsis[illegible] their family and their work teams. Again the distinction into part-time [illegible] full-time is not clearcut. Some of the small-scale fishermen are also [illegible] but achieve lower earnings than the large-scale fishermen. Virtually all [illegible] have gardens (farms) although the "full-time" larger-scale fishermen have [illegible] farms and employ labourers. Thus, rather than a clear classification there [illegible] range of fishing activity from pure subsistence of a few, through large [illegible] of men earning a few shillings a day, to the successful commercial fisher[illegible] whom there is a core group and a penumbra with fluctuating fortunes. Even [illegible] "core" suffer fluctuations of income, particularly from the recent drying [illegible] lake, but they also appear to be making a relatively quick recovery. Perhaps [illegible] is itself an indication of the more commercial, the larger-scale fishermen. For [illegible] these reasons any distinction is blurred. The present survey takes income [illegible] from catch rates as the dividing line, with the more successful or "big" men [illegible] earning over £1 a day. This gives sixty-three fishermen, 15.3 per cent of the [illegible] sample; of these, twenty, or 4.9 per cent, earn more than £2 daily, would be [illegible] "core."

The survey found that most of the big fishermen sampled are over [illegible] years old, and almost a third of those earning more than £2 daily are over [illegible] Adding this information to that on the initial money capital of fishermen, it [illegible] would seem that one general pattern for these big fishermen is of a gradual [illegible] of capital and gear over the years. Only a small minority actually start with [illegible] amounts of expensive equipment. Thus, one-half of those earning £2 or more [illegible] started with less than £10 capital. However, as one would expect, there is a [illegible] positive relationship between large money capital and catch rates in that all [illegible] men who had capital of over £100 all earn between £1 and £5 daily. These large [illegible] amounts of capital are used to buy shore seines which do achieve high catches. [illegible] But scoop nets and gill nets, which cost far less, can also earn quite high [illegible] incomes, and some fishermen are able to save steadily over the years to be able [illegible] eventually to buy a shore seine. Thus, a large initial capital has not been a [illegible] necessary precondition to high income.

Virtually all big fishermen own their own boats, and they are the owners [illegible] of the few plank boats in the sample. Similarly the expensive shore seines [illegible] and the chirimira are owned by the richer fishermen: this is obviously economic [illegible] since these nets have high catch rates. A large proportion of the big fishermen [illegible] also own gill nets.

The number of big fishermen with no education is less than in the total [illegible] sample, but the different levels of education show no relationship to the catch [illegible] rate figures. There is, however, a connection between success as a fisherman and [illegible] previous job history. More of these big fishermen have had other jobs previously [illegible] than have the other fishermen, 55 per cent against 30 per cent. Further, a third [illegible] of those earning more than £2 daily had been domestic servants in Rhodesia or [illegible] South Africa, a much higher proportion than for other fishermen. Now, however, [illegible] none of those earning more than £2 daily and only one of those earning between [illegible] £1 and £2 daily want to leave fishing for another job. This would presumably [illegible]